- Practical: the top 5,000 most commonly used words
- Learner friendly: gives you the core vocabulary for Chinese quickly
- Useful: 30 thematic boxes give the top words for a specific topic

A Frequency Dictionary of Mandarin Chinese

A Frequency Dictionary of Mandarin Chinese is an invaluable tool for all learners of Mandarin Chinese, providing a list of the 5,000 words and the 2,000 Chinese characters most commonly used in the language. Based on a 50-million-word corpus composed of spoken, fiction, non-fiction and news texts in current use, the dictionary provides the user with a detailed frequency-based list, as well as alphabetical and part-of-speech indexes.

All entries in the frequency list feature the English equivalent and a sample sentence with English translation. The dictionary also contains 30 thematically organised lists of frequently used words on a variety of topics such as food, weather, travel and time expressions.

A Frequency Dictionary of Mandarin Chinese enables students of all levels to maximise their study of Mandarin vocabulary in an efficient and engaging way. It also represents an excellent resource for teachers of the language.

Series preface

Frequency information has a central role to play in learning a language. Nation (1990) showed that the 4,000–5,000 most frequent words account for up to 95 per cent of a written text and the 1,000 most frequent words account for 85 per cent of speech. Although Nation's results were only for English, they do provide clear evidence that, when employing frequency as a general guide for vocabulary learning, it is possible to acquire a lexicon which will serve a learner well most of the time. There are two caveats to bear in mind here. First, counting words is not as straightforward as it might seem. Gardner (2007) highlights the problems that multiple word meanings, the presence of multiword items, and grouping words into families or lemmas, have on counting and analysing words. Second, frequency data contained in frequency dictionaries should never act as the only information source to guide a learner. Frequency information is nonetheless a very good starting point, and one which may produce rapid benefits. It therefore seems rational to prioritise learning the words that you are likely to hear and read most often. That is the philosophy behind this series of dictionaries.

Lists of words and their frequencies have long been available for teachers and learners of language. For example, Thorndike (1921, 1932) and Thorndike and Lorge (1944) produced word frequency books with counts of word occurrences in texts used in the education of American children. Michael West's General Service List of English Words (1953) was primarily aimed at foreign learners of English. More recently, with the aid of efficient computer software and very large bodies of language data (called corpora), researchers have been able to provide more sophisticated frequency counts from both written text and transcribed speech. One important feature of the resulting frequencies presented in this series is that they are derived from recently collected language data. The earlier lists for English included samples from, for example, Austen's Pride and Prejudice and Defoe's Robinson Crusoe, thus they could no longer represent present-day language in any sense.

Frequency data derived from a large representative corpus of a language brings students closer to language as it is used in real life as opposed to textbook language (which often distorts the frequencies of features in a language, see Ljung, 1990). The information in these dictionaries is presented in a number of formats to allow users to access the data in different ways. So, for example, if you would prefer not to simply drill down through the word frequency list, but would rather focus on verbs for example, the part of speech index will allow you to focus on just the most frequent verbs. Given that verbs typically account for 20 per cent of all words in a language, this may be a good strategy. Also, a focus on function words may be equally rewarding – 60 per cent of speech in English is composed of a mere 50 function words. The series also provides information of use to the language teacher. The idea that frequency information may have a role to play in syllabus design is not new (see, for example, Sinclair and Renouf, 1988). However, to date it has been difficult for those teaching languages other than English to use frequency information in syllabus design because of a lack of data.

Frequency information should not be studied to the exclusion of other contextual and situational knowledge about language use and we may even doubt the validity of frequency information derived from large corpora. It is interesting to note that Alderson (2007) found that corpus frequencies may not match a native speaker's intuition about estimates of word frequency and that a set of estimates of word frequencies collected from language experts varied widely. Thus corpus-derived frequencies are still the best current estimate of a word's importance that a learner will come across. Around the time of the construction of the first machine-readable corpora, Halliday (1971: 344) stated that "a rough indication of frequencies is often just what is needed". Our aim in this series is to provide as accurate as possible estimates of word frequencies.

Introduction

The need for a frequency dictionary

A good dictionary is indispensable for language learning. This is particularly true when learning a second or foreign language. There are many kinds of dictionaries, designed for different purposes and having different values for different readers. For instance, a dictionary in multiple volumes that incorporates encyclopaedic or etymological knowledge may not be terribly relevant for language learners unless they are at very advanced levels. Different types of dictionaries can benefit different types of learners. Of those dictionaries that are specifically created for language learners, the focus is usually on providing basic information such as definitions, glosses and word classes illustrated by suitable examples. Such dictionaries typically follow the lexicographic convention of arranging words in alphabetic order so that, while providing an effective and convenient way of looking up a specific word, they do not tell learners which words are more commonly used – that is, which words learners are more likely to encounter at different stages of learning. Neither can a conventional dictionary tell learners which words they are more likely to encounter in different registers such as speech, news, imaginative or informative writing.

It is in these regards that a frequency dictionary as an innovative type of dictionary proves valuable. While it is clearly naıve to state simply and boldly that the most frequent words are the most important to learn, frequency ranking is nonetheless "a parameter for sequencing and grading learning materials" because frequency is "a measure of probability of usefulness" and "high-frequency words constitute a core vocabulary that is useful above the incidental choice of text of one teacher or textbook author" (Goethals 2003: 424). As Leech (1997: 16) argues: "Whatever the imperfections of the simple equation 'most frequent' = 'most important to learn', it is difficult to deny that frequency information derived from large collections of text (corpora) has an important empirical input to language learning materials."

With that said, one should not assume that there is an irreconcilable conflict between the frequency and more conventional dictionary. Rather they have different focuses and are complementary to each other. In this dictionary, for example, we have provided just one illustrative example for each word included, even though the word can have different meanings. Readers seeking a broader range of illustrative examples may refer to a different type of dictionary. In addition, for a small number of words included in this dictionary where the word can have different pronunciations for its different senses, we have not indicated which pronunciation corresponds to which word sense. Again, a different dictionary can help with that issue. These decisions were motivated largely by considerations such as the levels of intended readership, the size of the dictionary (see section 5 for further discussion) and, crucially, what was readily available elsewhere. We did not want to unhelpfully replicate what other dictionaries could provide. This dictionary should be used with a conventional learner dictionary – not instead of one.

Like other volumes in the Routledge Frequency Dictionary series, A Frequency Dictionary of Mandarin Chinese furnishes a list of core vocabulary for learners of Mandarin Chinese as a second or foreign language, especially learners whose first or second language is English. This dictionary will prove useful for such learners, whether they are instructed in the classroom or are independent learners. It should also prove of benefit to teachers.

How might classroom learners use this dictionary? Classroom learners normally rely on a selected textbook, which is typically organised around a variety of themes (e.g. shopping, eating out). Thematically related words are surely of benefit in vocabulary acquisition, but a textbook rarely if ever tells learners which of these words are more likely to appear in their actual reading or conversation. In fact, it is very likely that some of those words, which they have learnt with painstaking effort, never occur beyond the classroom situations invented specifically for the sake of language learning. In other words, learners will not find a chance to employ those words in real communication contexts, unless they are talking about a specialised topic. As you will see in the callout boxes for themed vocabulary embedded in the main frequency index of common words, some words are infrequent in the language, but can be potentially useful when discussing specific topics. That's why we have decided to include 30 thematically related lists (see section 5). These thematically related lists are one resource that classroom learners should want to draw upon.

What of the independent learner? They tend to have needs somewhat distinct from those of the classroom learner. They may pick up a piece of text, e.g. a work of fiction or a newspaper, and step through it word by word, consulting a dictionary to check on words which are new to them. While such independent learners work on authentic texts, they may often suspect that their learning could be more effective if they knew at the outset that they were learning the most common words in general Mandarin, as these would be the words which they are most likely to encounter in a wide variety of contexts. They would then work towards specialised and infrequent vocabulary. A frequency dictionary should make an ideal companion for such learners.

Finally, how might teachers use a dictionary such as this? Language teachers should find a frequency dictionary a very helpful source of information. On the one hand, the frequency dictionary provides a graded list of vocabulary with authentic examples, which is valuable supplementary material to complement a textbook. On the other hand, the teacher may find it frustrating that some students entering intermediate level are deficient in vocabulary. In such cases, a frequency dictionary will be an advantage as it affords a structured remedy in this regard. Last but not least, the frequency information contained in this dictionary, which is based on a large balanced collection of data (see section 2), will prove a valuable resource in guiding and informing the development of a language teaching curriculum.

The corpus

Given that the frequencies presented in this dictionary are derived from a large collection of Chinese language, a so-called corpus, it is clearly important to present the corpus data used in this dictionary. For a dictionary that aims to provide a frequency-based core vocabulary for learners, a well-composed corpus is essential. We think that such a corpus must satisfy four requirements for the intended purpose. First of all, it must be large enough to yield a basis for reliable quantification; second, it must achieve a reasonably wide coverage of registers so that learners are exposed to commonly used words in different communication contexts. Third, the language contained in the corpus must be current. Finally, in addition to the quality of data per se, corpus processing must be sufficiently reliable, and this is particularly important for a Chinese frequency dictionary because running texts in Chinese must first of all be segmented into legitimate tokens (a computational process known as segmentation or tokenisation, see below) before they can be annotated with word class information.

The corpus in this dictionary is composed of written and spoken texts from four broad categories as shown in Table 1, totalling roughly 50 million word tokens (or 73 million Chinese characters). The spoken component contains 3.4 million words, covering face-to-face conversations, telephone calls, cross-talks, movie and play scripts, interviews, storytelling, public lectures, radio broadcasts, and public debates, which were mostly produced in the 1990s and 2000–2006.[1] The news component comprises 16 million words of newswire texts released in 1995 by the Xinhua News Agency and newspaper texts published by the People's Daily in 1998 and 2000, in addition to the news categories in the Lancaster Corpus of Mandarin Chinese (LCMC)[2] and the UCLA Written Chinese Corpus.[3] The fiction component amounts to 15 million words, including all fiction categories in LCMC and UCLA Chinese corpora in addition to novels and short stories sampled from various periods in the twentieth century, with the majority published in the 1980s–1990s. The non-fiction component is composed of all informative categories in LCMC and UCLA corpora, together with various non-literary texts of different genres such as official documents, academic prose, applied writing and popular lore, which were sampled from different periods in the second half of the twentieth century, totalling 15 million words.

While the majority of our corpus data introduced above are monolingual Chinese texts, we have also used a parallel corpus composed of Chinese fictional and non-fictional texts with their English versions, which has allowed us to extract, for each of the selected words included in this dictionary, an illustrative example with English translation.[4]

Once the texts (including transcripts of spoken data) were collected, the next step was to segment the running strings of characters in these texts into word tokens. For alphabetical languages like English, word tokens in a written text are normally separated by white spaces so that the one-to-one correspondence between orthographic and morpho-syntactic word tokens can be considered as a default with a few exceptions: multiwords (e.g. so that and in spite of), mergers (e.g. can't and gonna) and variably spelt compounds (e.g. noticeboard, notice-board, notice board). In Chinese, however, since a written text contains running strings of characters with no delimiting spaces, one has to determine where the words are in the data. More specifically, as it is the computer that is analysing the data, a process must be run which allows the computer to determine where the words are. This process is called word segmentation. Word segmentation requires complex computer processing, which generally involves lexicon matching and the use of a statistical model (cf. McEnery, Xiao and Tono 2006: 35).

The segmentation tool we engaged to process our Chinese corpus is ICTCLAS, an acronym for the Chinese Lexical Analysis System developed by the Institute of Computing Technology, Chinese Academy of Sciences. The core of the system lexicon incorporates a lexicon of 80,000 words with part of speech information. The system is based on a multi-layer hidden Markov model and integrates modules for word segmentation, part of speech analysis, so called part of speech tagging, and unknown word recognition (cf. Zhang, Liu, Zhang and Cheng 2002). The rough segmentation module of the system is based on the n-shortest paths method (Zhang and Liu 2002). The model, based on 2-shortest-paths, achieves a precision rate of 97.58 per cent, with a recall rate as high as 99.94 per cent (ibid.). In addition the average number of segmentation candidates is reduced by 64 times compared to the full segmentation method. The unknown word recognition module of the system is based on role tagging. The module applies the Viterbi algorithm to determine the sequence of roles (e.g. internal constituents and context) with the greatest probability in a sentence, on the basis of which template matching is carried out. The integrated ICTCLAS system is reported to achieve a precision rate of 97.16 per cent for tagging, with a recall rate of over 90 per cent for unknown words and 98 per cent for Chinese person names (ibid.).

ICTCLAS applies a very fine-grained part of speech annotation scheme, or tagset, (see Appendix) to corpus data. A tagset is the list of part of speech distinctions made by the programme, while tagging is the process whereby the machine decides which part of speech applies to each word and a tag is the individual mnemonic assigned to each word in the corpus by the computer when the tagging has determined which tag each word should have.

For the purpose of a frequency dictionary, we think that a less fine-grained tagset than that provided by ICTCLAS is more helpful as this can have a boosting effect on words of the same form but with minor difference in usage. Hence we decided to merge subcategories and similar part of speech categories. Our decision to combine those subcategories was also motivated by the fact that Chinese does not have a very strong link between word classes and grammatical functions. For example, adjectives can be used directly as adverbial (tagged as ad by ICTCLAS) while a verb can behave syntactically like a noun (tagged as vn) or adverb (tagged as vd). In addition, non-predicate adjectives (tagged as b) and descriptive adjectives (tagged as z) are also merged into the broad category of adjectives. As it is not always possible to differentiate between idioms (tagged as i) and fixed expressions (tagged as l), the two categories are combined into the category for idiomatic and formulaic expressions. These manipulations resulted in a tagset for use in this dictionary, which consists of 20 part of speech tags as shown in Table 2.

When the texts were tokenised and annotated with part of speech information, the corpus was converted from the local character encoding GB2312 into Unicode (UTF-8), with register information and linguistic annotation marked up in the extensible mark-up language (XML) so that the corpus could be used with our PERL (Practical Extraction and Retrieval Language) scripts to build frequency indexes for use in this dictionary. This will be discussed in section 4. But before that, let us have a look at the previous frequency dictionaries and lists of words and characters in Chinese.

Previous frequency dictionaries of Chinese

Ours is not the first frequency dictionary of Chinese. It is, however, quite distinctive, as can be demonstrated by considering the other frequency dictionaries of Chinese that have been created.

Because of the large inventory of characters in Chinese, there has been a long tradition of teaching Chinese characters on basis of frequency, though the research of word frequency on the basis of large collections of text only became possible in the 1990s, with the advent of more powerful computers and specialised computer software for word segmentation. There are at least a dozen frequency lists or dictionaries of Chinese characters and words including, for example:

- Chen's (1928) Yutiwen Yingyong Zi Hui (The Applied Glossary of Modern Chinese): listing 4,261 distinct Chinese characters on the basis of six corpora (children's books, newspapers, women's magazines, after-class work of schoolchildren, classic and modern fiction, and miscellaneous) totalling 554,478 Chinese character tokens;
- Liu's (1973) Frequency Dictionary of Chinese Words: giving statistics such as frequency, dispersion index and usage rate for 3,059 most frequently used words in Chinese on the basis of a 0.25-million-word corpus covering five registers (fiction, drama, essays, newspapers and periodicals, technical writing);
- Xiandai Hanzi Zonghe Shiyong Pindu Biao (A Comprehensive Frequency Table of Character Usage in Modern Chinese), established on Project Code 748 (1976): listing 4,152 frequently used characters on the basis of a corpus of 21 million characters;
- Beijing Aeronautical University (1985) Xiandai Hanyu Yong Zi Pindu Biao (A Frequency Table of Character Usage in Modern Chinese): listing frequently used characters for ten genres and technical domains on the basis of samples totalling 11.08 million characters;
- Beijing Language and Culture University (1986) Xiandai Hanyu Pinlu Cidian (A Frequency Dictionary of Modern Chinese): listing 16,593 commonly used words extracted from 1,315,752 word tokens (or 1.82 million characters);
- National Language Committee (1988) Xiandai Hanyu Changyong Zi Biao (Commonly Used Characters in Modern Chinese): listing the most commonly used 2,500 characters and 1,000 commonly used characters on the basis of data collected by Beijing Aeronautic University covering the period 1928–1986;
- Hong Kong Polytechnic University (1991–1997) Zhongguo Dalu, Taiwan, Xianggang Hanyu Ciku (A Chinese Word Bank from Mainland China, Taiwan, and Hong Kong): listing 68,011 entries based on a 6-million-character corpus of news texts published during 1990–1992 in the three Chinese speech communities.

With the exception of Liu (1973), all other character and word frequency lists and dictionaries are published in Chinese. All of them are targeted either at native speakers of Mandarin learning their mother tongue (e.g. Chen 1928; National Language Committee 1988), or at language engineers (e.g. the frequency list by Project Code 738) and expert Chinese linguists (e.g. the word bank by Hong Kong Polytechnic University for studying language variation).[5] And with the exception of Liu (1973), all of the existing frequency dictionaries of Chinese characters and words were published and distributed in China, which makes it difficult for learners of Chinese as a second or foreign language outside China to get access to them.

Liu (1973) was published by Mouton and released worldwide, but it also suffers from a number of drawbacks. Like nearly all existing Chinese frequency dictionaries, it is based exclusively on written Mandarin; the data on which the dictionary is based are quite outdated, with texts published during the period 1910–1960; with a total of 0.25 million word tokens, the corpus is also rather small by today's standards; the word class categories featuring in the book are quite obsolete nowadays; no actual Chinese characters are used in the dictionary, these being replaced by a kind of Romanisation system which is no longer widely used; and most importantly, no English gloss or translation, no illustrative example, and no information related to usage are given, making the dictionary almost useless for today's learners of Chinese as a second or foreign language.

Table 3 HSK graded lists and words and characters in Chinese

HSK level	Words	Characters

Last but not least, we should not fail to mention the Syllabus of Graded Words and Characters for Chinese Proficiency compiled by the Chinese government's Hanyu Shuiping Kaoshi (the Chinese Proficiency Test, HSK) Committee, which was published in 1992 and revised in 2001. The HSK lexical syllabus lists the words and characters required of learners of Mandarin Chinese as a second or foreign language to pass the Chinese proficiency test HSK, as indicated in Table 3. While the lexical syllabus is undoubtedly instructive for learners of Mandarin – we have made special effort to include as many words as possible from the syllabus, especially Level 1 and 2 items (see section 4 for further discussion) – it serves a different purpose from a frequency list. The words in the syllabus are arranged conventionally in alphabetical order for each level rather than in the order of frequency, and no actual frequency or frequency ranking is given.

The compilation of the lexical syllabus, which was corpus-based, started in 1988 and the latest texts covered were produced in 1991. Unsurprisingly, most "new words" included in the syllabus are from the early 1980s while some words that were common in the 1970s–1980s, e.g. 少先队 "young pioneer" will not be common enough to merit a place on the list nowadays. On the other hand, many well-established vocabulary items which are commonly used today as a result of technological and social development are not covered in the syllabus, for example: 网络 "network", 手机 "mobile phone", 媒体 "media", 客户 "client", 机制 "mechanism", 市场经济 "market economy", 出国 "go abroad", 品牌 "brand", 消费者 "consumer", 上网 "go online", 总裁 "CEO", 董事长 "chair of the Board of Directors", 打工 "do odd jobs", 上市 "put on market", 开发区 "development zone", 股市 "stock market", 超市 "supermarket", 出租车 "taxi", 荧幕 "screen", 证券 "stock, share", 下岗 "get laid off", and 网站 "website".

A comparison of the HSK graded vocabulary and the frequency index in our dictionary appears to suggest that the corpus on which the HSK vocabulary is based relies too heavily on the Beijing dialect, as evidenced by dialectal usage like 半拉 "half" (Level 2) and words ending with the retroflective suffix 儿, including Level 1 words such as 小孩儿 "child", 面条儿 "noodle, pasta", Level 2 words such as 聊天儿 "chat" and 墨水儿 "ink", and Level 3 words such as 拐弯儿 "turn a corner, make a turn" and 药水儿 "liquid medicine". Words like these are normally listed in a dictionary without the retroflective 儿, which is tagged in our corpus as a suffix.

Selection of words and characters

According to the HSK lexical syllabus, learners of Chinese as a foreign language who have learnt about 5,000 words will be able to express their ideas on general issues in Chinese. As can be seen in Table 3, this vocabulary is approximate to the total of HSK Levels 1–3 words. The number of words we have decided to include in this dictionary is roughly comparable. While it is certainly true that the larger your vocabulary the better it is, it is nonetheless increasingly more difficult to learn new words as your vocabulary grows. This is because, according to Zipf's law, the frequency of a word is reversely proportional to its rank in the frequency table. As such, there is a 9.27 per cent increase in coverage from top 1,000 to top 2,000 words, whereas the

Table 4 Coverage of top N words

Top N words	Coverage (%)	Increase (%)
1,000	66.24	–

9,000	91.42	0.94

increase in coverage drops to 0.94 per cent from top 8,000 to top 9,000 words (see Table 4). In addition to the reference to the HSK syllabus, our decision to include 5,000 words was also empirically based by the sharp drop in coverage (from 3.07 per cent to 1.77 per cent) from top 5,000 to top 6,000 words.

As can be seen in Figure 1, which shows the increase and drop in coverage resulting from each additional block of 200 characters, Zipf's law also applies to characters. Coverage grows very slowly after the top 1,200 characters. The top 2,000 characters cover nearly 98 per cent of our whole corpus, with 4,839 characters accounting for the remaining 2 per cent of coverage.

We would like to point out that the above distribution statistics are based on a valid lexicon that we created from the corpus. By "valid lexicon", we mean the frequency lists of words and characters that exclude items that are "uninteresting" from the perspective of vocabulary acquisition, e.g. symbols and punctuations, Arabic numerals (written in either full- or half-length), and non-Chinese character strings. We have also excluded abbreviations, numeral characters indicating years, person names, place names, organisation names, as well as other proper nouns such as names of countries, nationalities and languages, as well as brand names. Table 5 indicates the size of our valid lexicon.

While a frequency dictionary could be arranged simply in the order of raw frequencies, i.e. actual occurrences of words and characters, we have enlisted a more scientific way to decide which words and characters to include, which takes account of

Table 5 The valid lexicon

Register	Word tokens	Chinese characters
Spoken	2,692,315	3,824,579
News	12,147,572	20,185,322
Fiction	11,973,365	16,424,649
Non-fiction	11,900,160	17,954,729
Total	38,713,412	58,389,279

their frequencies as well as their distribution in different registers. Words and characters which are frequently used in more registers are clearly more useful than those that are frequent in fewer registers. In this dictionary, we have adopted the same hierarchy composed of three coefficients as established in Juilland and Chang-Rodriguez (1964), namely frequency, dispersion index and usage rate, which are explained as follows.

There are two types of frequency data. Raw frequency refers to the actual occurrence of a word or character in a corpus while normalised frequency means the frequency that has been adjusted to a common base, for example, in this case, the occurrences per million tokens so that the four registers covered in our corpus can be compared even if they are of different sizes. We have used normalised frequencies in different registers to compute dispersion index and usage rate, while the overall normalised frequency is also given in the entry for a headword so that the reader can easily compare the frequencies of different words on a common basis of per million words. Dispersion coefficient (D) is computed according to Juilland and Chang-Rodriguez's formula:

$$D = 1 - (n\sum x_i^2 - T^2)^{1/2}/2T$$

In this formula, n stands for the number of word types and T for the number of word tokens. This formula reduces dispersion to a coefficient ranging from 0–1, regardless of frequency. Words with a higher dispersion coefficient are more evenly distributed in different registers. The usage rate (U) takes account of both frequency and dispersion, which can be taken as a dispersion (D) percentage of frequency (F) or vice versa according to the following formula:

$$U = F \times D /100$$

This means that when D = 1 the usage rate equals frequency, and when D = 0.5 the usage rate is half of frequency. Hence, a more frequent word with a lower dispersion index can have a lower usage rate. For example, as the word 说 "say" is distributed fairly evenly in the four registers (9,383 instances per million words in spoken, 9,998 in fiction, 4,658 in non-fiction, 3,753 in news), it has a large dispersion index (0.80). If the word has an overall frequency of 27,792, then its usage rate will be 22,252. In contrast, the interjection 哎 has an overall frequency of 1,821 instances in our corpus, but it is distributed unevenly in the four registers (1,697 in spoken, 119 in fiction, 5 in non-fiction and 0 in news). Its dispersion index is much smaller (0.21), and its usage rate is 383 in spite of its high overall frequency.

We wrote PERL scripts that automatically computed the overall normalised frequency, normalised frequency in each of the four registers (i.e. spoken, news, fiction and non-fiction), the dispersion index, and usage rate for each word and character in our valid lexicon. We have used a combination of these statistics, while also taking account of basic vocabulary in the HSK syllabus as well as our intuitive knowledge of the Chinese language, to decide which words and characters to include in this dictionary.

- All words with a dispersion index below 0.25 are excluded unless they have a usage rate above 100 or a normalised frequency above 1,000 in any of the four registers.
- All items with a usage rate below 45 are excluded unless they are on the Levels 1 and 2 lists in the HSK syllabus.[6]

- All words with an overall normalised frequency below 55 are excluded unless they are on the Levels 1 and 2 lists in the HSK syllabus.
- All words with a normalised frequency below three per million words in the register of fiction are excluded unless they have a usage rate above 100 or are on the Levels 1 and 2 lists in the HSK syllabus.

These operations helped to establish a core list of top 5,004 words from a total of 30,922 words from our valid lexicon. Out list covers 95.61 per cent of Level 1 words, 80.43 per cent of Level 2 words, 44.22 per cent of Level 3 words, and 18.12 per cent of Level 4 words in the HSK syllabus. In addition to many advancement-related new words like those mentioned earlier, our word list includes many commonly used compound words which are missing in the HSK syllabus, for example: 看到 "see", 很多 "many", 提出 "put forward", 有人 "someone", 受到 "come in for", 家里 "home", 说话 "speak", 造成 "cause", 父母 "parents", 来到 "come to", 带来 "bring", 想到 "think of", 找到 "find", 实际上 "in fact", 回到 "return to", 留下 "leave behind, remain", 加上 "add, include", 关注 "follow an issue with interest", 回家 "go home", 哪儿 "where", 吃饭 "eat a meal, eat", 见到 "see", 不再 "no longer", 很快 "fast; soon", and 听到 "hear" among many others. Such new additions are obviously more helpful to learners than some dialectal or outdated items in the HSK syllabus such as 半拉 "half" and 反动 "reactionary" and 少先队 "young pioneer".

We have followed a similar procedure to establish a core list of commonly used Chinese characters. The following cutoff points are used:

- an overall normalised frequency of 70 instances per million tokens;
- a usage of 50 instances per million tokens;
- a dispersion index of 0.35;
- a minimal frequency of ten in each of the four registers.

These operations produced a list of 2,015 most commonly used characters. In order to include as many basic characters required in the HSK syllabus, the final criterion above was not strictly applied to Level 1 and 2 characters in the syllabus. As a result, 14 additional Level 1 characters and 83 additional Level 2 characters are included in our character list, thus pushing the total number of characters included in this dictionary to 2,112, which covers 99.3 per cent of Level 1 characters, and 96.64 per cent of Level 2 character in the HSK syllabus. Our character index also covers 81.56 per cent of the 2,500 common characters published in China by the Ministry of Education for native speakers of Mandarin.

Organisation of the dictionary

Following this introductory chapter are a number of indexes of the 5,004 most commonly used words, which are arranged in frequency rank order, in alphabetical order, in frequency rank order as per word classes, as well as a list of the 2,112 most commonly used Chinese characters mapping each character onto the top 5,004 words. The frequency index of the book also features a series of embedded callout boxes that show thematically related vocabulary. The remainder of this chapter will give more details of each of these indexes.

Frequency index

This section lists the 5,004 most commonly used words in the descending order of frequency rank. The following information is given for each of the listed headwords:

- frequency rank (in descending order of usage rate);
- headword in Simplified Chinese;
- headword in Traditional Chinese;
- Pinyin gloss of the headword;
- HSK Level (if the word is listed in the HSK syllabus);
- an illustrative example in Simplified Chinese (authentic example cited from our Chinese–English parallel corpus);
- English translation of the example (from our Chinese–English parallel corpus);
- normalised frequency per million words;
- dispersion index;
- usage rate;
- register code (i.e. S or W indicating whether the word is exceptionally common in speech or writing).

A typical entry looks like the following:

> Frequency rank Headword in Simplified Chinese [Headword in Traditional Chinese] /Pinyin/ (Optional HSK Level) Part of speech English gloss
> Illustrative example in Simplified Chinese and English translation of the example
> Normalised frequency | Dispersion index | Usage rate | Optional register code

Here we show a concrete example of an entry:

> 0263 然后 [然後] /ránhòu/ (1) adv afterwards, then > 你走到第二个十字路口，然后向左拐。 You go ahead to the second crossing and then turn left.
> 1887 | 0.66 | 1241 | S

In this example, the headword with the frequency rank of 0263 (i.e. the 263rd most commonly used word in our corpus) is 然后, which is written as 然後 in Traditional Chinese. The Pinyin gloss of the word is ránhòu. It is listed as a Level 1 word in the HSK graded vocabulary. This is an adverb, meaning "afterwards, then", as exemplified in 你走到第二个十字路口，然后向左拐。"You go ahead to the second crossing and then turn left." This headword has an overall normalised frequency of 1,887 instances per million tokens and a dispersion index of 0.66 in our corpus, and thus a usage rate of 1,241 instances per million tokens. It is exceptionally common in spoken Mandarin.

At this point, we would like to remind the reader that when a headword has more than one sense, these senses are separated by a comma or a semi-colon, with the former for similar senses and the latter for different sense groups. However, when an orthographic word has different senses for different word classes, they are listed separately. For example, the orthographic word 会 can function as a verb (0035) meaning "can, know how to do; meet; be likely to, be sure to", or as a noun (0864) meaning "meeting, conference; moment". The two homonymous words are kept separate. Nevertheless, as our corpus is only tagged with part of speech information but not annotated with word senses, it is impossible to find out the frequencies of different word senses of a homonymous or polysemous word if these senses belong to the same part of speech. Consequently similar and different word senses of the same word class are simply grouped together with the appropriate punctuation mark indicated above. It is also important to note that different senses of a word may have different Pinyin glosses and thus be pronounced differently. In such cases we simply insert commas to separate different Pinyin glosses without mapping Pinyin glosses to word senses,[7] and would like to advise the reader to consult a traditional dictionary to ascertain how a word is pronounced for a particular word sense.

Of the information given for each headword, HSK Level and register code are optional. A label for the HSK Level (i.e. 1–3) is only shown if the word is listed in the HSK graded vocabulary, while a register code (S or W) is available only if the word is exceptionally common in speech or writing. Please note that some words may have more than one meaning that belong to different HSK Levels, which are separated by a comma. For register code, two criteria were employed to determine whether a word is exceptionally common in speech or writing. If a chi-square test indicates that the difference in frequencies of the word in speech (i.e. the spoken register) and writing (e.g. fiction, non-fiction and news) is significant at the probability level $p < 0.0000001$ while at the same time the S/W ratio (or the W/S ratio) is greater than 3, the word carries the register code S (or W). Of the 5,004 most common words covered in this dictionary, 103 words are exceptionally common in speech while 203 are exceptionally common in writing.

This frequency index constitutes the meaty part of the book, which gives you all the essential information about each of the listed words. In addition, 30 callout boxes are embedded in this main frequency index, which feature thematically related vocabulary. They are organised along themes closely related to people's life, e.g. fruits, drinks and beverages, food (flavours, main food, meat, vegetables, food preparation, seasoning), clothing, weather and equipment, city facilities and stores, travel, directions and locations, cities, house and room, home electronics, computers and the Internet, school life and subjects, professions, sports, animals, and human body (physical appearance, body parts, parts on the head, senses). In addition, we have included a number of lists that help readers understand the Chinese language and culture, including the number system, time expressions, colours, Chinese festivals, Chinese zodiac signs, kinship and family relations, English loanwords in Mandarin, special vocabulary in language learning (terms for sentence analysis and punctuation marks), and commonly used words in various registers covered in our corpus (spoken, fiction, non-fiction and news). For most of the lists, frequency ranks are included, with frequent items on top of the lists unless stated otherwise in our comments. For example, the four lists of common words across registers are arranged by statistical salience. There are also a number of lists where no frequency ranks are given, which happens when a list shows an almost closed set of vocabulary items, or when few of the items on a list are covered in our valid lexicon (see section 4). When a themed list includes both items with a frequency rank and those without one, the list is arranged with most frequent words on the top, and then in the alphabetical order of words without a frequency rank. These thematic vocabulary lists are an important complement to frequency indexes in this dictionary because, as you will see, some words are important when you talk about a particular topic, yet they would only be included in a frequency list that covers top 20,000 common words. In other words, those words are infrequent in the language as a whole.

Alphabetical index

This section lists the 5,004 most common words in alphabetical order of the Pinyin glosses of headwords. A typical entry for the alphabetical index looks like:

Headword in Simplified Chinese /Pinyin/
Part of speech code English gloss Frequency rank

Here is a concrete example:

已经 /yǐjīng/ adv already 0101

In addition to providing the reader with a quick view of an entry, this alphabetical index also helps the reader to locate the entry in the main frequency index quickly and easily.

Part of speech index

This section gives a frequency index which shows, for each part of speech category, commonly used members in that group, covering all of the top 5,004 words in the main frequency and alphabetical indexes. For each entry in this part of speech index, the following information is included: frequency rank, headword in Simplified Chinese, Pinyin gloss, part of speech code, and English gloss.

This index helps readers to build up vocabulary while studying Chinese grammar. It also allows them to refer back quickly to the related items in the main frequency index.

Character frequency index

This frequency index lists the 2,112 most commonly used Chinese characters. We decided not to include part of speech information or English gloss, nor to give illustrative examples in this chapter. There are a number of reasons for this decision. First, as many characters in Chinese are meaningless unless they combine to form a word, it is not always possible to give an English gloss; second, as many of the common monosyllabic words have already been included in the three earlier indexes, it would be redundant to repeat their details here; third, as a focus on characters is different from the notion of words and parts of speech, English glosses and examples for headwords would be less instructive; finally, since the meaning of a Chinese word is not necessarily the aggregation of its constituent characters, learners are encouraged to build vocabulary "words" instead of characters. For each of the 2,112 commonly used characters included in this index, the following information is given:

Frequency rank Simplified Chinese
[Traditional Chinese] /Pinyin/ (Optional HSK Level) List of headwords in word frequency index containing the character and word frequency ranks

An example entry is as follows:

0017 们 [們] /men/ (1) 我们 0026 他们 0041 们 0111 你们 0179 人们 0237 它们 0535 咱们 0540 她们 0567

Each Chinese character in this index is linked to the words in the main frequency index. The frequency ranks of the linked words are given to enable readers to make cross-references easily. If no headword is included in the word frequency index (i.e. the headword is not in the top 5,004 list) for a certain character included in this index, only the character in Simplified Chinese, its Traditional Chinese version, and its Pinyin gloss (and the HSK Level if available) are given. The index of the top 2,112 characters is of help to readers when they decide which characters to learn first; it can also enable learners to switch smoothly between Pinyin and characters, and between Simplified Chinese and Traditional Chinese. In addition, the commonly used words containing the same characters which are mapped from the main frequency index are particularly useful in vocabulary building.

One must remember, however, that a dictionary is not simply a repository of information of use to learners of a language – it is also an embodiment of the language to some degree. As the language encodes in part a worldview and history, the dictionary also stands as a cultural artefact. The background of the language represented here thus deserves some consideration.

A brief introduction to Mandarin Chinese

Chinese belongs to the Sino-Tibetan languages. It is spoken by a total of 1.3 billion speakers. Of these, the majority are native speakers of Mandarin (i.e. Standard Chinese based on the Beijing dialect) as opposed to another variety of Chinese such as Cantonese. Mandarin Chinese has a total of 1,052 million speakers, more than twice as many as speak English, the language with the second highest total of speakers, at 508 million (see Ostler 2005). Mandarin Chinese is the official language of Mainland China and Taiwan; it is also one of the official languages of Singapore and the United Nations.

There are currently more than 30 million people in the world who are learning Mandarin Chinese as a foreign language.[8] The popularity of Chinese as a second language is growing. For example in the United States, the number of Chinese learners is growing fastest in comparison to learners of other foreign languages. In Britain, Mandarin is studied by more children than German and Russian (only French and Spanish are presently more popular); and Mandarin is expected to overtake Spanish in three years if the rate of growth continues.[9]

Probably the most striking difference between Chinese and most other languages is purely visual – its written form. English, and many other languages, employ an alphabetical system. Chinese uses a logographic system, i.e. roughly speaking, the symbols of English encode sounds, whereas those in Chinese either singly or in combination encode words, with each character being a syllable. As a result the Chinese writing system is relatively complex – English has only 26 alphabetical characters (i.e. letters) that can be arranged in different combinations to form tens of thousands of different words, Chinese has tens of thousands of individual characters that represent words. What makes it even more difficult for learners to build up their Chinese vocabulary is that, while some Chinese characters represent single words, it is more common for characters to function in combination to form words, many of which have a different meaning than the simple aggregation of the meanings of constituent characters (see below for further discussion). To make things yet more complex, since Chinese does not use white spaces to delimit words in writing, learners have to decide for themselves which characters in the running text form a word when they read, though word boundaries can be inferred in spoken Chinese on the basis of spoken features such as pauses and repetitions. Given the huge number of Chinese characters, and of words, it is not only quite impossible, but totally unnecessary as well, for learners (or average native Chinese speakers) to know tens of thousands of Chinese characters and words (see section 4). This explains why a frequency dictionary of Chinese, which provides core lists of characters and words in this language, can be of particular advantage as a guide to vocabulary teaching and learning.

As noted earlier, some Chinese characters can serve as words; they can also combine with other characters to form new words. In terms of word types, the overwhelming majority of Chinese words are disyllabic, as illustrated in Figure 2, which shows the proportions of words at different levels as required in the HSK syllabus. As can be seen, disyllabic words account for 72 per cent on average while the proportion of monosyllabic words is roughly 22 per cent. Words composed of three characters or more are relatively infrequent. It is also interesting to note that, as the HSK Level increases, disyllabic words increase in number while the proportion of monosyllabic words drops. This is probably because many high-frequency function words, which are more likely to be monosyllabic words, are typically required at HSK Level 1. For the same reason, monosyllabic words are expected to make up a large proportion of Chinese texts in terms of word tokens.

This expectation is in fact borne out in our corpus data. The "valid lexicon" (see section 4) which furnishes a quantitative basis for this dictionary comprises 38,713,412 word tokens (running words in the text) in 84,883 word types (different words). Of these, there are 6,413 monosyllabic words (7.56 per cent of the total), yet they account for 54.08 per cent of total tokens. In contrast, while 46,670 disyllabic words take up the largest proportion in terms of word types (54.98 per cent), they account for 42.33 per cent of total word tokens. Although three-character (22.35 per cent) and four-character words (13.24 per cent) are also very frequent, they do not contribute much in terms of word tokens, as shown in Figure 3.

A character corresponds to a syllable in spoken Chinese (cf. Li and Thompson 1980: 13). While classical Chinese can be classified as a monosyllabic language, this is no longer true of modern Chinese. As we have noted, monosyllabic words only account for 22 per cent of the graded vocabulary in the HSK syllabus, while the proportion of monosyllabic words in Mandarin as a whole is much lower (see Figure 3). Some characters can be used directly as words, e.g. 有 "have", 来 "come", and 新 "new"; some characters can serve directly as words or as parts of a word, the meaning of which may or may not be related to the meanings of individual constituent characters (e.g. 我 "I, me", 们 "plural suffix" and 我们 "we, us" versus 东 "east", 西 "west" and 东西 "stuff"); some characters cannot stand alone as words (e.g. 蝴蝶 "butterfly" and 葡萄 "grape").

Words in Chinese can be simplex or compound. A simplex word has one morpheme, which can be monosyllabic (e.g. 天 "sky", 去 "go", 他 "he, him") or polysyllabic (仿佛 "as if", 往往 "often, frequently", 咖啡 "coffee"). In contrast, a word made of more than one morpheme is called a compound word.

There are different types of compound words in Chinese according to their internal structures, namely, coordinate (e.g. 寒冷 "cold"), endocentric (e.g. 冰箱 "ice-box, refrigerator"), verb-complement (e.g. 提高 "raise, improve"), verb-object (洗澡 "take a bath or shower"), subject-predicate (e.g. 地震 "earthquake"), affixed (e.g. 刀子 "knife"), and reduplication (姐姐 "elder sister").

While the discussion above appears to suggest that "wordhood" is easy to define in Chinese, it is nevertheless not always easy or even possible to make a distinction between morphemes and words on the one hand and between words and phrases on the other hand (cf. Wu 2003: 3). In fact, a whole range of criteria have been proposed to define wordhood of various types, e.g. orthographical word, morphological word, lexical word, syntactic word, grammatical word, semantic word, sociological word, psychological word, phonological word, prosodic word (see Di Sciullo and Williams 1987; Dai 1998; Duanmu 1998; Packard 2000; Feng 2001a). On the basis of a review of such criteria, Dixon and Aikhenvald (2002) propose to maintain a distinction between phonological and grammatical words, which may or may not coincide. While the authors concede that the criteria that they engage to define a phonological word do not apply in every language, they offer three "universal criteria" that define a grammatical word: "A grammatical word consists of a number of grammatical elements which (a) always occur together, rather than scattered through the clause (the criterion of cohesiveness); (b) occur in a fixed order; (c) have a conventionalised coherence and meaning" (ibid.: 19).

Unfortunately, the so-called "split words" in Chinese satisfy none of these criteria. The morphemes that make up a split word can not only scatter through the clause instead of occurring together (e.g. 睡觉 "sleep": 睡了一天觉 "slept for a whole day"), they can even occur in a reversed rather than fixed order (e.g. 上学 "go to school": 学，我爱上就上，不爱上就不上，谁管得着。 "School, I'll go if I like and won't if I don't. Who has the right to interfere?"). Dixon and Aikhenvald (ibid.: 20) comment that criterion (c) means that as a word has its own coherence and meaning, speakers of the language "may talk about a word (but are unlikely to talk about a morpheme)." This criterion does not apply in Chinese either, not only because morphemes in Chinese can be coherent and meaningful (a monosyllabic word consists of one morpheme) but also because even bound morphemes in split words such as 请客 "invite/treat guest(s)" can be "talked about", e.g. 请了三桌客 "invited/treated three tablefuls of guests". According to Dixon and Aikhenvald (ibid.: 6), "the (grammatical) word forms the interface between morphology and syntax. Morphology deals with the composition of words while syntax deals with the combination of words". In Chinese, however, word-internal structures are similar to syntactic structures (Dai 1998; Wu 2003: 3), as can be seen in the types of Chinese compound words discussed above.

As far as split words are concerned the difficulty lies in the fuzzy distinction between words and phrases. Many competing criteria have been proposed to differentiate (compound) words from phrases, e.g. conjunction reduction, freedom of parts, semantic composition, syllable count, insertion, exocentric structure, adverbial modification, XP substitution, productivity, and intuition (see Duanmu 1998 for a review). However, while each of these tests "may work in certain areas for certain cases, there is no overall generalisation and constraint on what is a compound and what must be a phrase" (Feng 2001b). By grammatical criteria such as splitability and insertion, disyllabic split words such as 吃饭 "eat", 睡觉 "sleep", 走路 "walk", 跑步 "jog", 关心 "care for", and 担心 "worry about" are phrases, but they are generally accepted as words by native speakers whereas those that can be judged as words by grammatical criteria (e.g. 多弹头分导重返大气层运载工具 "multiple independently targeted reentry vehicle, MIRV") may not be accepted as words. This is not only because "the morphological system of Chinese is strongly sensitive to prosodic foot" (Feng 1997: 135), but also because the "word sense" of a native speaker of Chinese is based on prosody (cf. Feng 2001a). Duanmu (1998) also observes that "there is a rich body of phonological evidence, especially metrical and tonal evidence, for the distinction between words and phrases in both Mandarin and other Chinese dialects". This view of wordhood is line with Matthews's (1991: 209) statement that "the word tends to be a unit of phonology as well as grammar".

Because of the multidimensional properties of wordhood in Chinese (cf. Feng 2001a), we decided to take a less rigid approach to what counts as a word. As noted in section 2, some of the "words" included in this dictionary can be more appropriately called formulaic expressions, e.g. 不得不 "have to", 也就是说 "that is to say", 与此同时 "meanwhile", 忍不住 "cannot help but", and 有意思 "interesting". We think that such commonly occurring formulaic expressions acting as larger "building blocks" of language are equally useful for learners, if not more so.

There are currently two sets of characters for the Chinese writing system: Simplified Chinese and Traditional Chinese. The former is officially used in Mainland China, Singapore and Malaysia while the latter is officially used in Taiwan, Hong Kong and Macau. Overseas Chinese-speaking communities generally opt for Traditional Chinese characters, but Simplified Chinese characters are gradually becoming popular. In this dictionary, we have given both Simplified and Traditional Chinese versions for each entry of word and character, but illustrative examples are shown only in Simplified Chinese as they appear in our corpus.

In addition to Chinese characters for the writing system, a commonly used alphabetical system known as Pinyin has been employed to Romanise the Chinese script. Pinyin uses the Latin alphabet to represent sounds in Mandarin. It is not only beneficial in helping native children and foreign learners to learn spoken Chinese before they start to learn Chinese characters, but it is also a popular method of inputting Chinese characters into a computer. There are four tones in the Pinyin system, with each syllable of every word characterised by one of them, except for a few syllables which are considered toneless. The tones, which are marked on one of the vowels (a, e, i, o, u) in a syllable, are first or "high" (a, e, ı, o, u), second or "rising" (a, e, ı, o, u), third or "falling-rising" (ǎ, ě, ǐ, ǒ, ǔ), and fourth or "falling" (à, è, ì, ò, ù). In this dictionary, toned Pinyin glosses are given for all entries of words and characters. It is important to note, however, that the same words can have different Pinyin glosses for different word senses (see section 5). Also the tones for the same characters in the word index and the character index may be different because of "tone sandhi", i.e. the change of tone that occurs when different tones come together in a word.

4 We would like to thank Professor Kefei Wang for granting us permission to use part of the data from the Chinese–English parallel corpus created by his team at Beijing Foreign Studies University.

5 The current national standard in China for Chinese Information Processing GB2312-80 (Character Set for Chinese Character Encoding in Information Exchange – Basic Set) is based on the frequency list established or Project Code 748.

6 The HSK Level 2 words 反动 "reactionary" and 红旗 "red flag" are excluded from our word list as they are not so common nowadays (ranking 5781 and 6004 respectively in our corpus) as they were during the so-called "Cultural Revolution".

7 This decision was motivated by the fact that in computer programming we had to keep the same kind of information (e.g. Pinyin gloss, or word sense) together in one field instead of mixing information of different kinds (e.g. Pinyin glosses and word senses).

一千万	yì-qiān-wàn	10,000,000
一亿	yí-yì	100,000,000

Comments:

1 For numbers above 100, O (零) líng must be used to make a difference between numbers such as 一百O一 (101) and 一百一 yī-bǎi-yī (110).

2 There are two ways to read or write a single unit of tens i.e. 一十 yı-shí (e.g. 一百一十 yı-bai-yı-shí for 110) or just 十 shí (e.g. 一百十 yì-bǎi-shí for 110).

3 Chinese has an additional unit of number unit 万 wan (10,000), which is not available in languages like English.

4 Ordinal numbers are prefixed with the prefix 第 as in 第一 "first".

5 半 ban in Chinese means "half".

6 With the exception of 零 líng "zero", numbers in words are rarely used for purposes other than to prevent fraud (e.g. for banknotes, cheques and contracts).

Comments:

For each of the four registers:

1 Remove all items with a dispersion index equal to or greater than 0.5;
2 First sort by normalised frequency of the register under consideration;
3 Compute the ratio of the register with the other three (normalised frequency of register / (sum of the normalised frequencies of the other three registers);
4 Cut off where there is a significant drop in the ratio computed in (2);
5 Because of the topics covered in the public lectures and debates in the spoken registers, some words which may not be typically spoken appear on the list, which are removed by hand, e.g. 火山 "volcano' (4935), 友 "friend" (2983), 辩 "argue, debate" (1798), 遗产 "heritage, inheritance, legacy" (3156), 焦点 "focus" (2699), and 皇帝 "emperor" (1546);
6 The list is arranged by statistical salience instead of frequency ranks.

Comments

For each of the four registers:

1 Remove all items with a dispersion index equal to or greater than 0.5;
2 First sort by normalised frequency of the register under consideration;
3 Compute the ratio of the register with the other three (normalised frequency of register / (sum of the normalised frequencies of the other three registers);
4 Cut off where there is a significant drop in the ratio computed in (2);
5 The list is arranged by statistical salience instead of frequency ranks.

Comments:

For each of the four registers:

1 Remove all items with a dispersion index equal to or greater than 0.5;

2 First sort by normalised frequency of the register under consideration;

3 Compute the ratio of the register with the other three (normalised frequency of register / (sum of the normalised frequencies of the other three registers);

4 Cut off where there is a significant drop in the ratio computed in (2);

5 The list is arranged by statistical salience instead of frequency ranks.

Comments

For each of the four registers:

1 Remove all items with a dispersion index equal to or greater than 0.5;

2 First sort by normalised frequency of the register under consideration;

3 Compute the ratio of the register with the other three (normalised frequency of register / (sum of the normalised frequencies of the other three registers);

4 Cut off where there is a significant drop in the ratio computed in (2);

5 The list is arranged by statistical salience instead of frequency ranks.
